default, Photoshop opens a document in the Canvas size, which is as large as the document's native size in pixels. There are two ways to open your document. You can choose from a list of them in the File menu and then select File > Open... or you can just start typing the location of your file in the Open dialog box. The interface is divided into three areas of the screen that communicate how you're viewing your Photoshop document. You can refer to the Scopes area of the window (see Figure 2-11) for a refresher. This area shows you the most important information about the document you are viewing. For example, it will show you the current size of the image and any layers you have created. It will also show you information about the image's transparency mode (not shown in Figure 2-11), which tells you how the alpha layer will influence the transparency of pixels below it. Figure 2-11: The Scopes area shows you the current size of your document, the number of layers, and whether you have created any masks. The Layers area of the window (see Figure 2-12) shows you the various layers you have created. Usually the first layer on your document is a new layer that you've created. Select the layer by clicking on it and then double-click to open the Layer Control dialog box (refer to Figure 2-12). Then, in the Layers area, you can select the Pencil tool and begin drawing on the document, or select the Brush tool and begin painting on the document. The History area of the Photoshop window (refer to Figure 2-11) shows you the various actions you've performed on your image. Click a button to undo or redo the action. If you've created multiple Ophthalmological examination and visual function tests. In patients with eye problems, assessing eye health requires an interdisciplinary approach involving several aspects of eye care. It can include a comprehensive clinical examination to measure visual functions and tear functions, ocular motility, and refraction; a diagnostic approach to rule out treatable causes of eye symptoms or signs; an evaluation of complaints (eg, visual problems, headaches, fatigue) to assess their impact on the patient; and a determination of other eye conditions, such as glaucoma, which require treatment.
